About the University

University of Allahabad has always occupied an esteemed place among the Universities of India for over a century. Established on 23rd September 1887, it is the fourth oldest University of India after Calcutta, Bombay and Madras University. The credit for conceiving a large Central College in Allahabad eventually to develop into a University, goes to Sir William Muir, Lt. Governor of United Provinces. As a result of his initiative the foundation stone of the Muir Central College (named after him) was laid on December 9, 1873 by His Excellency Lord Northbrook. Sir William Muir said on the occasion; "The establishment of a central College at Allahabad has been my earnest desire ever since I assumed my present office." Shortly after coming here, I found that a strong wish prevailed among the chief people of the place for a better means of education at Allahabad and being myself deeply impressed with the same conviction, I took occasion at the first Darbar which I held here to urge upon those present the necessity of showing that they were sincere and in earnest, by contributing to the work.

About the Symposium

The one-day symposium on "Human Health and Diseases with special reference to Reproductive Health in Young Women" will provide a platform for the scientific community to discuss and highlight the latest advancements in reproductive health research. The symposium will focus on the challenges faced by young women in maintaining their reproductive health, including issues related to sexually transmitted infections, infertility, and maternal mortality. It will bring together experts in the field of reproductive health, including physicians, researchers, and public health specialists, to share their knowledge and expertise. The symposium aims to provide a comprehensive overview of the current state of reproductive health research and identify areas for future investment and collaboration. The symposium will also offer opportunities for young scientists and students to network with leading researchers and learn about new developments in the field. The program will include keynote lectures, panel discussions, and poster presentations. It will provide ample opportunities for networking and interaction with leading researchers. The event will conclude with a panel discussion focused on the role of science and technology in improving reproductive health outcomes for young women globally.

Let us all celebrate the power of science and its potential to create a better future for everyone.
